ProsProtects device with applications: Google uses in-store surveillance and devices to protect against malicious applications. Google only claims 0.05 percent of Android devices that do not download apps from its Play Store have a potentially harmful application.

The app also includes Google Play Protect, which regularly scans your device for potentially harmful applications and checks apps before downloading them from the Google Play Store. Free music or subscription: Google Play Music offers a competitive alternative to other music services, such as Spotify and Apple Music with personalized playlists and radio stations, podcasts, albums and individual songs, which you can listen for free or with a subscription. (Part of the customization comes from the purchase of Google Songza.) A monthly subscription of $9.99 offers unlimited ski trails and an advertising-free music stream. And Google constantly seems to offer a free trial of several months of Play Music, so you can try for free for a few months to see if you love it before paying for it.

Popular applications attract simulators - with false names and icons - and the choice of the original between the forger can be complicated. Google Music is not part of a family division: Play Music is not part of the Google Play family plan. To share the music with five family members, you need a subscription to music for $14.99 a month.

Google Play doesn't need to be protected until the task is: An independent security test firm AV-Test found that Play Protect was marked far beyond the top antivirus Android when detecting harmful programs, and noted that those who rely only on Play Protect to protect your phone had an unnecessary risk.
