Read the short essay below and answer the questions.

The twenty-first century is already turning out to be the century of advanced technologies. The technological evolution that started after the Second World War is now developing more quickly and computing and other technological advances are beginning to reach into and influence and take over nearly every aspect of our lives. The more effects advanced computing has had on our lives are in the areas of economics and communications.

Technology has had big changes in economic and business systems and operations. Businesses now have to be using cloud services or machine learning or risk failure. Consequently, many big corporations base its operations on computing, regardless of which sector they are in. For instance, Coca-Cola, the BBC and Levi's market, sell different products and services, yet they all share one basic property - without advanced computing services their operations would collapse. New technologies are a generator of economic dynamism. China and India and many other developing countries have huge IT sectors which drive their economies. Furthermore, the major drivers of economies, including Germany, the United States, Japan and others are moving from an industrial-based economy to a computing and IT-based one.

The other important effect of technological changes is the redefining of communication. For example, in the past, people spoke either on fixed phones or landlines, which slowed down the communication process. Now there are mobile, land or dual using mobile devices. Instead of writing emails or letters or spending time finding a postbox, we can communicate instantly on land lines or secondly via telephone or mobile devices. New forms of communication objects are changing as fast. As a result, new paths are being formed of telecommunication away from each other can communicate as much as they want and whenever they want.

In conclusion, computing and new technologies have had a profound effect on us. There are many ways, and it is in business and communications that they have had the greatest influence. In the future, if technology continues making all such speed, our business practices and methods of communication will undergo even greater changes. It is already starting to bring changes to other parts of our lives, such as transportation and health.

1. Which two parts of our lives has computing changed?

2. Can you give an example of how computing is important in business?

3. What might happen to a company if it didn't keep up with technological advances?

4. Why is it easier to communicate with people in other parts of the world now than in the past?

5. Which two parts of our lives will be affected by new technologies in the future? Can you think of just one example for each?
